

I really enjoyed the Last Lecture and found it very inspiring. I was very shocked to hear that, when this video was shot, he had less than 6 months to live and was still taking time out of his life to help others work towards achieving their own dreams. Two things in this video really stuck out to me. The first thing was the brick walls.

Brick walls aren't there to stop you, they're there to make sure you really want something bad enough to push past those walls. This is something I hadn't really heard before and I think a lot more people should hear it. Whenever someone is learning something like a new skill, there will always be these brick walls, these times where it feels like you're not improving. Everyone always has some different advice for how you should push through these walls, but as long as you keep trying, eventually you will break through.

The second point that really stuck out to me was that experience is what you get when you don't get what you want. I think this is important because it's really telling you that even if everything seems like it's going wrong, you are still getting something out of it. You are getting experience that could prove to be valuable some time down the road.
